Copyright Issues Related to Publishing Your Dissertation

OVERVIEW

Copyright affects your dissertation in two ways that warrant your attention:

- Copyright ownership – As an original work of authorship fixed in a tangible medium of expression, your dissertation is protected by copyright, which gives the copyright owner the exclusive right to reproduce, prepare derivative works, and distribute it to the public. You most likely own the copyright to your dissertation, but this might not be the case if your research was sponsored.

  What you need to do: If your research was sponsored by Carnegie Mellon or conducted under an agreement between an external sponsor and Carnegie Mellon, you need to check the agreement to see who owns the intellectual property. When in doubt, consult Carnegie Mellon’s Center for Technology Transfer and Enterprise Creation, 412-268-7393, innovation@cmu.edu.

- Copyright permissions – Works created by other people that you want to incorporate into your dissertation are also protected by copyright, for example, tables, figures, photographs and text, including work you previously published if you transferred the copyright to the publisher. You must get permission from the copyright owners to use these materials in your dissertation.

  What you need to do: You need to acquire written permission to include third-party materials in your dissertation. To avoid publication delays, you should get permissions from the copyright owners as early in the process as possible, rather than waiting until you’re ready to publish.

Carnegie Mellon offers two options to publish your dissertation. CMU Libraries publishes CMU graduate student dissertations in Research Showcase @ CMU. ProQuest/UMI publishes dissertations authored by students around the world in the ProQuest Dissertations and Theses Global database. You may choose one or both options. Both options require you to address copyright ownership and permissions, and to grant the publisher the non-exclusive right to reproduce and distribute your work. Neither requires copyright transfer. CMU’s Guidelines on Author Rights and Preservation strongly encourage you to publish your work in Research Showcase @ CMU for long-term preservation and access. To make an informed decision about where to publish your work, see Decisions to Make.

DETAILS

Your dissertation is copyrighted. As an original work of authorship fixed in a tangible medium of expression, your dissertation is protected by copyright. Copyright exists as soon as a work is fixed in a tangible medium. By giving the copyright owner the exclusive right to copy, prepare derivative works, and distribute the work to the public, copyright gives the copyright owner the ability to determine whether and how the copyrighted work is used by others. For general information about copyright, including how to register, see Copyright Basics.

Copyrights do not have to be registered to be “official.” Copyright exists, without registering your work with the U.S. Copyright Office, as soon as a work is fixed; you don’t need to register a copyright to make it official. But there are advantages to registration. For example, your copyright must be registered before you can sue someone for infringing it.

You can register your copyright using the U.S. Copyright Office’s eCO Online System for a fee of $35. Alternatively, if you choose to publish your work with ProQuest/UMI, UMI will register your copyright for you for a fee of $55. (See page 6 of the ProQuest Publishing Agreement.)

You must get permission to use other people’s work. Because of copyright protection, you must get permission to use other people’s work in your dissertation. ProQuest/UMI provides a useful guide on Copyright and Your Dissertation or Thesis.

If you choose to publish with CMU Libraries, you need not provide copies of the permission letters. The assumption is that you have complied with university policy. According to the Fair Use Policy of Carnegie Mellon University, all members of the University community must comply with U.S. Copyright Law. When a proposed use of copyrighted material does not fall within the fair use doctrine and is not otherwise permitted by license or exception, written permission from the copyright owner is required to engage in the use.

If you choose to publish your dissertation with ProQuest/UMI, you must sign an agreement indicating that you have the necessary copyright permissions, and provide UMI with copies of the permission letters. Failure to get appropriate permissions may delay the publication of your dissertation. In addition, the UMI Publishing Agreement states that you are solely responsible for getting appropriate permissions and that you will indemnify PQ/UMI for any third party claims related to the work you submit. This means that if someone sues ProQuest/UMI for copyright infringement because of materials you used improperly without permission in your dissertation, you will be responsible for all of ProQuest/UMI’s costs associated with the suit (in addition to any other costs or penalties that might be involved).

To avoid publication delays, Carnegie Mellon’s Office of the General Counsel encourages graduate students to get permission from copyright owners as early in the dissertation process as possible. This includes permission to use your own previously published work if you transferred your copyright to the publisher.

Don’t assume you can use things under “fair use.” “Fair use” permits small portions of copyrighted works to be used for limited purposes without the copyright owner’s permission. But a “fair use” analysis is quite complex and the allowable uses are limited. You can’t justify failure to get appropriate permission to use other people’s work in your dissertation simply by claiming “fair use.” See the Fair Use Policy of Carnegie Mellon University, especially Appendix A. See also Copyright and Your Dissertation or Thesis: Ownership, Fair Use, and Your Rights and Responsibilities.
You probably need permission to use your own previously published work. If portions of your dissertation have previously been published in research journals, conference proceedings or similar publications, you probably need to get permission to use your own previously published work in your dissertation. Try to locate the agreement you signed with the publisher to determine what it says about copyright. The agreement probably required you to assign your copyright to the publisher, therefore you will need the publisher’s permission to include the work in your dissertation. In some cases, the agreement may give you a license to use the work in certain ways even though the publisher owns the copyright. The only way you will know is to read the agreement. If you can’t locate your agreement call, email or write to the publisher and request a copy.

Get permission in writing. A sample permission request letter is available in ProQuest/UMI’s Copyright and Your Dissertation or Thesis. Send a similar request letter to the copyright owners of the materials you want to use. As discussed above, the copyright owner is not necessarily the author of the work. To determine who owns the copyright to articles you have published, read your publishing agreement. For other materials, examine the publication, database, web site or other source where you obtained the materials for information about copyrights and/or where to send requests. Look at the copyright page of books and at the copyright, terms and conditions and/or legal notices areas of online databases or web sites. Making preliminary phone calls and/or emails to determine the correct party to contact will prevent difficulties later on. Keep all the permissions you obtain. You will need to send copies of them to ProQuest/UMI if you choose to publish your dissertation with them.

Creative Commons Licensing: The CMU Guidelines on Author Rights and Preservation strongly encourage you to publish your work under a Creative Commons (CC) license and to grant users as broad a set of rights as possible.

If you want to publish or post a copy of your dissertation under the terms of a CC license, you can easily do that if you publish with CMU Libraries in Research Showcase @ CMU. Simply contact Katie Behrman, kbehrman@andrew.cmu.edu, and tell her what CC license you want to use.

If you want to publish your dissertation with ProQuest/UMI, you should be to post a copy under a CC license as long as the Creative Commons license you select only grants non-exclusive rights and the terms and conditions included in the license do not conflict with the kind of license you choose under the ProQuest Publishing Agreement.
